On page 120, no. 57 of Vol. I, it is written that this medal is somewhat rare, followed by the comment; The date and object of this piece have not been clearly ascertained. The style of dress might place it about 1572 and the device is not inapplicable to the circumstances of that period, when Elizabeth fortified her kingdom against the anticipated attacks from the Roman Catholic powers of Europe. She was considered the chief support of the reformers, who might deem their cause as defenceless without her, as a castle would be without arms. Perry, who was chiefly directed by Hollis interprets the legend as referring to the Portcullis, Rose and Fleur-de-lis and to the influence of Elizabeth abroad as well as at home and also as intimating that power must support dignity and independence.

This medal was rated as somewhat rare in Medallic Illustrations Vol. I in 1885.
